And so we’re excited today. Because we know that mentorship and leadership are essential pillars for success in public health. We are excited today because we believe that this program will strengthen current leaders in public health in Sudan and provide them with added skills in mentorship to inspire those more junior to follow in their footsteps. Uh, there’s nothing that interests us more than contributing to higher education and public health and ultimately translating into the training of a new generation of public health leaders, both in research and in practice, and in teaching for the nation of Sudan. One great nations and a country in whose potential has not yet been reached. We hope that we continue to be a vibrant partner for you. There is no doubt. That mentoring is a key ingredient. As the most cost effective way. To advance the field, especially in research and publications. So the next generation of Junior and mid career faculty. Of global health research. And scientists will benefit really from this program. Uh, is something in Sudan.
